The feeling in India against the omission of cotton goods from the list of dutiable articles under the new tariff has risen almost to fever heat. The omission has been dictated from home and is as strongly condemned by official opinion in India as by the public generally, and in the public meetings which have been held on the subject appeals have been made to the official members of Council to vote in accordance with their conscience. On the 10th ultimo a meeting of the Council was held at which the report of the Select Committee to report on the Bill to amend the Law relating to Customs Duties was brought up. It was not upon to any unofficial member to propose directly that duties should be imposed on cotton goods, as this would have been proposing new taxation, which unofficial members are not allowed to do; but to the motion for the adoption of the report an amendment was proposed that the Bill should be referred back to the Committee, and on that amendment a debate took place on the exemption of cotton goods from taxation and it was resolved on that question that the vote was taken. It resulted in the defeat of the amendment by the official majority, as so often happens in this and other Crown Colonies. The official vote numbered eleven against the unofficial seven, but there appeared to be practical unanimity of opinion, only one of the official members making any defence of the exclusion of cotton goods on the merits of the question.

Two of the official members explained their reasons for voting against the amendment, but personally approving it. The Hon. Mr. SERRAVALLO, after condemning the exclusion of cotton goods, said that if they were living under a system of what is technically called responsible government, under which His Excellency's Executive Council would be solely responsible for projects placed before them, and under which the effect of the amendment being carried would be his hon. friend Mr. WESTLAND, with his colleagues, would resign, and His Excellency would commission his hon. friend Mr. PLATT to form an administration to carry out forthwith the opinions with which he (the speaker) was in sympathy, there would be no difficulty in coming to a decision. But the facts were far different. His Excellency was himself the head of the Executive Government; the Council were not to be deposed by votes of theirs. After setting out reasons against the reduction of business to a deadlock, the speaker concluded by saying that because he felt confident that the question would be reconsidered and the object therein gained, he deemed it his duty not to vote in a manner which he thought would tend to cause serious inconvenience to His Excellency's administration. General DRAKE-RENNETT was the other member who while condemning the exclusion of cotton goods, gave his reasons for voting against the amendment. He said he could not conceive a case of any member of the Council voting against his conscience, and he put it as a case of subordinating his personal judgment to that of Her Majesty's Government. "The British Empire in India," he said, "is dependent for its very existence on the material aid and support which it receives from Her Majesty's Government. Such dependence has, both in its political and official aspects, certain natural obligations, and the first of these obligations is unobdurate to imperial interests. These interests must be judged, not by the representative of any part of that Empire, but by Her Majesty's Government who are responsible for the whole. I believe, my duty as one of your Lordships' Council is to be guided by the strongest representation of what in our more intimate local knowledge we consider for the best interest of this great Indian Empire, and having so represented, to accept loyally the decision of Her Majesty's Government. I am further convinced that to attempt to govern India on any other principle is to wander from what is practical and safe into what is fantastic and dangerous. I am, therefore, voting according to my conscience and the best of my understanding in opposing the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. PLATT." The General admitted, however, that there might be cases in which he would decline to support the Government. "If, for example," he said, "orders were to be issued that, rather than impose additional taxation, military expenditure was to be cut down to a point which would, in my conscientious opinion, endanger the safety of British rule in India, I should consider it my duty to resign my post in your Excellency's Council, all because I could not become a party to what my conscience would tell me I ought not to consent to. But in this case my conscience gives me no such mandate." In the majority of cases in which the official members of Council in Hongkong or elsewhere vote against their individual opinion they probably have as little difficulty in justifying their action to their own conscience as General SERRAVALLO or Mr.

THE DAILY PRESS

HONGKONG, APRIL 18th, 1896.

THE question of the right of official members of the Legislative Council of the Crown Colonies to vote in accordance with their individual convictions, when those convictions happen to be opposed to the policy of the Government, has often been discussed. The same question has just been raised, under very important circumstances, as regards the Imperial Legislative Council of India. The feeling in India against the omission of cotton goods from the list of dutiable articles under the new tariff has risen almost to fever heat. The omission has been dictated from home and is as strongly condemned by official opinion in India as by the public generally, and in the public meetings which have been held on the subject appeals have been made to the official members of Council to vote in accordance with their conscience.
